(only used in aor. tūto), to make strong or efficient, make valid, accomplish; [cf. Zend tau, 'to be able,' tavan, 'powerful,' Pers. توان tuvān, 'power;' توانم tuvānam, 'I can,' Gr. τύλος, τύλη, τυλός, τῆς: Lat. tumar, tumere, tumidus, tumulus (?), tuber, tuert, tatus: Umbr. तु 3. tu, ind. (a particle, perhaps connected with the pronom. base 2. ta, or with the Vedic pronom. ta; never found at the beginning of a sentence or verse, and causing the verb with which it is constructed to retain its accent). As a particle implying 'earnest entreaty' or 'urgent request' it is often used in the Veda, like Lat. dum, with an imperative, and may be translated by 'pray!' 'I beg,' 'do' (e. g. ā tveta, come here, do); or it may be rendered by 'well,' 'now then,' 'now,' 'just.' As an adversative particle it is equivalent to 'but,' 'on the contrary,' 'on the other hand' (e. g. na śhināti janayati tu, he does not destroy but he produces). The sense 'but' is most common in later Sanskrit.

Tu is sometimes, however, used for ca, 'and' (e. g. ā samudrāt pūrvā ā samudrāt tu paśīmāt, to the eastern sea and to the western sea); and even for vā, 'or' (e. g. uśhtra-yānaṃ samāruhya khara-yānam tu, having ascended a camel-carriage or one drawn by donkeys). Sometimes it appears to be incorrectly written for nu (e. g. kin tu for kin nu). Occasionally it seems to be used for taḍā after cet (e. g. tām cet na ditseyam pramathyainām hareyus tu, if I were not willing to give her then they would take her by force). Not unfrequently tu is used as an expletive to fill out a verse or prevent the blending of vowels (e. g. īrshyī ghrīnī tv a-santushāh, &c., an envious man, one over-compassionate, a discontented man, &c.). Tu—tu, although—yet; api-tu, moreover; kin tu, but, nevertheless, notwithstanding; paran tu, moreover, but, nevertheless; na tv eva tu, but by no means. According to lexicographers tu implies disjunction, mutual opposition, alternative, asseveration, emphasis, conjunction, &c.

In some passages of the Taittirīya-Saṃhitā he is regarded as bestowing long life; while elsewhere he is supposed to reside in the remotest regions of the world, whence the idea of wishing to remove calamity to Trīta or to the remotest place possible; cf. Rīg-veda VIII. 47, 14. In some passages of the Veda, Indian commentators explain Trita by trīsthāna, 'reaching through the triple world,' as an epithet of Indra or Vāyu. In later myths Trita is described as a Rishi, by whom several hymns of the Rīg-veda were composed. Sāyana in his introduction to Rīg-veda I. 105, relates that there were three Rishis, named Ekata, Dvita, and Trita, who lived in a desert country; being parched with thirst, they looked about for a well, and having found one, Trita entered it to draw water, when the other two, desirous of obtaining his property, threw him into the well and closed up the mouth with a wheel; shut up in the well, Trita composed a hymn to the gods, and managed, in a marvellous manner, to perform the Soma sacrifice, that he might drink the Soma himself before death, or offer it to the deities in the hope of being extricated by them: his preparation of the Soma is described in the Mahā-bh. Sāyana-parva 2095, and he is elsewhere celebrated as an officer of the Soma. In various other epic legends, Ekata, Dvita, and Trita are described as three brothers, sons of Gautama or of Prajā-pati, = Brahmā. According to the Bhāgavata-Purāna, Trita is one of the twelve sons of Manu and Nadvālā. Some identify the Vedic Trita with the Vedic Traitana, and with Thraetana the Zend form of Feridun. His connection with water points to a comparison with the Gr. Τριτων, τριτο-γενής, Τριτωνίς, Τριτο-πάροπος, &c. (Trita seems also to mean) a class of deities, 'the third ones,' i. e. those who live in the sky (?); the priest who prepares the Soma.

ध्व्र dhvra, cl. I. P. dhvraṇati, &c., to sound; (a various reading for dhraṇ.)

न 1. na, the twentieth consonant of the alphabet, and the fifth letter of the fourth or dental class, having much the sound of the English n in tenth. — Na-kāra, as, in, the letter or sound na.

न 2. na, ind. a particle of negation equivalent to 'not,' 'no,' 'nor,' 'neither' [cf. no, nanu, na-hi, na-tarām], and in the Veda a particle of comparison; it is used as a negative particle in wishing, requesting, and commanding (e. g. na mā garan nadyah, let not the waters swallow me; nāvaman-yeta kañcana, let him not despise any one), but not in prohibition before an imperative, and not before the aorist when it has lost its augment and stands for an imperative (in both which cases mā, q. v., is used). When joined with the potential, na may often have the sense of 'that not,' 'lest,' 'for fear lest' (e. g. na tvāṃ śapet, lest he should curse thee). In argumentative writings na often comes at the end of a hypothetical argument in the sense 'not so' (e. g. naṃu na kiñcān mānam iti cen na, now if it be said that there is no proof, not so). Two nas are not unfrequently used in the same sentence to intensify an affirmation (e. g. na khalu na tat karishyāmi, I will most certainly do that; na tu jātu na, most assuredly), or any other negative particle may be joined with na with the same effect (e. g. nādaṇḍyo 'sti, he is not to go unpunished, i. e. he must certainly be punished). When a negation has to be repeated in successive clauses of a sentence or in successive sentences, na may be simply repeated or may be strengthened by one of the particles uta, ca, api, śāpi, vā, athavā (e. g. nāham asyārāzasya devatā na tāpy asya gireh, I am not the deity of this forest nor of this mountain), or the negative is not expressed in the second clause but represented by vā or api vā or ca standing alone (e. g. na hrishyati glāyati vā, he neither rejoices nor desponds), or two clauses may have the negative particle and not a third (e. g. na deveshu na Yaksheshu mānu-sheshv api cānyeshu tādrig rūpavātī drishṭa-pūrṣā, neither among gods nor Yakshas nor other mortals has so beautiful a female been before seen). Na is sometimes placed before round or collective numbers to denote a deficiency, the deficient number being prefixed in the inst. or abl. case (e. g. ekayā or ekena na viṃsatīh, not twenty by one, i. e. nineteen; pañcabhīr na catvāri satāni, 395). When na is the negative of the simple idea expressed by a word, it may be regarded as compounded with it, and is then identical with 3. a, q. v. (e. g. na-vidvas, unwise; nādhīta, unread; na-kiñcana, q. v.) Na is often joined with other particles, e. g. na ca, na śāpi, nāpi, nota, na vā, naiva, na caiva, nāpi ca, na tu, na tveva, na tveva tu, na et (see ced), na khalu, na ha (after this last a verb is said to retain its accent if used in the future with an imperative sense, Pāp. VIII. 1, 31). Na is frequently used in early Vedic composition as a particle of comparison = 'like,' 'as,' 'as it were' (e. g. tvā nāvāṃ na dhīmāhi, we meditate on thee like a boat; cf. 3. a, which also in a few instances = 'like'); it is also found in this sense in the later artificial poems; [cf. Lat. ne, non; Gr. νῆ in νῆ-κερδῆς, νῆ-κερδῆς; Lith. ne; Slav. ne; Goth. ni, ne, nei; Angl. Sax. na; Old Germ. ni; Hib. nā.]

I. 11); nāmnā vāc or nāma grah, to address by name, mention or call upon by name; nāma kri or nāma dā or nāma dhā or nāmnā kri or nāmnā vi-dhā, to give a name, to name, call (e.g. Sāvitrīti nāmāsyās cakruḥ, they called her name Sāvitrī; Lakshmanam iti nāma kṛitavān, he named him Lakshmanam; tān Duhkha-labdhi-kān nāmā cakāra, he called her Duhkha-labdhi-kā). Nāman often occurs at the end of an adj. comp., in which case the fem. is generally nāmnī (e.g. Vishṇu-śarma-nāmā paṇḍitah, a sage named Vishṇu-śarma; nādi-nāmnī kanyā, a girl with the name of a river); but the fem. may be also nāmā from nāman and nāmā from a base nāma, which is rarely substituted for nāman at the end of a comp. नु nu, ind. (perhaps related to I. nava; cf. nūtana), written nū in Ved. at the beginning of a verse and frequently in other places. (As an adverb of time in Ved.), now, still (e.g. nū-ča purā-ča, both now and heretofore; asti svin nu viryam tat te, hast thou still that power?). (As an inferential particle in Ved. often beginning the last sentence of a hymn), now therefore, now then, therefore, then (e.g. nū no rāsva, do thou therefore give us); (as an introductory particle, or in encouraging, invoking, inviting, summoning), now, then, pray, come then (e.g. abhi nu mā cakṣhamithāh, pray now [Sāy. quickly] have compassion upon me). Nu is often employed in questions, both in Ved. and classical Sanskrit, to strengthen an interrogative pronoun or adverb (e.g. kadā nu, when indeed? katham nu, how indeed? krva nu, where indeed? kaṃ nu pṛicchāmi, whom can I possibly ask? kim nu syāt, what can that possibly be? kim nu khalu, why in the world?). Nu is also used interrogatively in classical Sanskrit, without an interrogative pronoun, in sentences of two or more clauses (e.g. svapno nu māyā nu matī-bhramo nu, was it a dream? or an illusion of magic? or a mental delusion?). Nu also serves as a particle of affirmation, to express 'indeed,' 'certainly,' 'surely' (e.g. ahaṃ nv akārṣham, Yes, I certainly did so), and often gives emphasis to the word it follows without being itself translatable, in which way it is frequently connected in the Veda with other particles (e.g. with cid in cin nu; with id in in nu; with adha in adha nu; with gha in ghā nu, &c.); but in the Veda nu sometimes means 'never' (especially in the construction nū cid = never, nevermore; in other passages it is said to = 'from this time forward,' 'for ever'). In classical Sanskrit nu is sometimes found in connection with ēā, 'or,' and in Rāmāyaṇa II. 72, 27, nu—nu may be translated 'either'—'or.' According to native commentators on the Veda nu often = kshipram, quickly. According to native lexicographers nu is used in the following senses: pṛicchā, vikalpa, vītarka, avunaya, atīta, apamāna, hetu, apadeśa; [cf. nī-nam, nū-tana; Zend nū, 'just now'; Gr. nū, nū-vū, vū; Lat. num, num-c; Goth. nu-h; Old Germ. nu; Slav. nynie, 'at present'.]
